There, Susan exclaimed. I look as old as a miss of fourteen and I can be quite as dignified. I will put on my best silk dress, and my silk hose, and my Sunday shoes with the silver buckles. As she spoke, Susan pulled out boxes and opened a chest and drawers. Then she stood in front of her mother, her arms loaded with finery. She made a quaint little curtsey. The family of the President of the Continental Congress will be represented at the Royal Governors party, she said. Mistress Susan Boudinot will take the place of Madam Boudinot. A space of a half-hour later a dignified little lady stepped out of the door of the Boudinot mansion and into a waiting chaise. Susan held her head very high. Was not her hair done up for the first time, and its mass of ringlets pinned with one of her mothers tortoise-shell combs Her buff brocade dress was made with a lace underbody. A polonaise and deep frills of lace edged the elbow-length, closefitting sleeves and fell as far as the small white hands. A blue locket on a strip of narrow black velvet ribbon was hung about the little girls throat, and over it all was thrown a ruffled cape of her mothers lined with fur. As the chaise rattled away toward the Governors mansion her mothers parting words to her repeated themselves over and over again in Susans mind. Be...
