Ex. n. When, of a figure of any nature, variable in magnitude and position but invariable inform, three lines fixed relatively to it turn round fixed points; all lines fixed relatively to it turn round fixed points, and determine homographic systems of rays at the several points. The first parts of these properties have been already established in Art. 56; from which as it appears also, from the invariability of one point fixed relatively to the figure in either case, that the several points determine similar rows on their several lines in the former case, and that (as is otherwise evident from their necessarily revolving simultaneously through equal angles) the several lines determine similar pencils at their several points in the latter case; therefore and c. Ex. o. If the three vertices of a variable triangle of constant species...
